PREFACE

It is hoped that this Reader will facilitate the practical use of my Grammar and Dictionary by scholars and students who may wish to acquaint themselves with the language, and by teachers who may wish to conduct courses in it. The most important texts are largely out of print and hard to find, except in large libraries; and even there, as a rule, only a single copy of each text will be found. Furthermore, it would hardly be an exaggeration to say that not one of the texts has been, in my opinion, satisfactorily edited. The selections here printed have been edited according to the principles which I think should be adopted for Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit (BHS), so far as this is made possible by the variant readings furnished in the critical notes to the printed editions. The editors of the Mahāvastu, Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra, Udānavarga, and Lalitavistara, especially the first three, seem to have been careful and conscientious in reporting the exact readings of the mss. they used. Those of the Saddharmapuṇḍarīka (SP) were far less so; it has been proved (see my §1.74) that they were very careless; their critical notes often report readings of their mss. wrongly, and far oftener fail to report at all differences of reading which are found in some or even most of the mss. they used. They also obviously attempted to change the saṃdhi of the prose of SP to standard Sanskrit saṃdhi, while only rarely reporting the saṃdhi of the mss. For these reasons the SP selections printed here cannot claim to be very close to a real critical edition, and in particular look far more like standard Sanskrit than such an edition would look.

It is unnecessary to repeat here what has been said in the first chapter of the Grammar (see especially §§1.33–56; 1.69–77) on the BHS tradition and the way to deal with it. Lüders' principle (§1.40) should be universally applied: any non-Sanskritic form presented in the mss. must, in general, be regarded as closer to the original form of the text than a 'correct' Sanskrit variant. Most editors, even down to the present, have proceeded on the opposite principle. Indeed, many have gone farther, and 'corrected' into Sanskrit non-Sanskrit readings found in all their mss. The plain fact is that BHS is not Sanskrit. Copyists and late redactors did much to Sanskritize it, but never fully succeeded, and modern editors are wrong in carrying the process further. Every Middle Indic or semi-Middle Indic form found in any stream of tradition of any BHS work should, as a rule, be welcomed and adopted in the text, even if Sanskritized substitutes are recorded in the same sentence. All BHS texts, even the Mahāvastu, have been subjected to a good deal of Sanskritization, some of it very likely going back to the original composition of the work, but much of it, in the case of most if not all BHS works, introduced by copyists and redactors in the course of the tradition. The Middle-Indicisms, or hybrid forms, which escaped this process should be put into the texts, as a general principle; they constitute precious evidence of an earlier time when the texts were (as most of them certainly were) much less Sanskritized than they seem in our mss. (Such relic forms, by the way, are considerably more numerous, in the prose of such texts as SP, Lalita Vistara (LV), and Divyāvadāna, than is often supposed.) Instead, many editors try to suppress them, reporting them in notes if they are conscientious, but too often (like the SP editors) failing to do even that. The principles here set forth, like most sound general principles, are not to be applied mechanically; the context, as well as variant ms. readings, will vary from case to case, and each must be separately studied.

The verses present special problems of their own. Here the very brief statements in my Introduction (especially §1.38) must be supplemented by my article 'Meter, Phonology, and Orthography in Buddhist Hybrid Sanskrit,' JAOS 66.197-206. In this place I can only mention briefly a few general principles of fundamental importance. Most BHS verses belong to types known in Sanskrit (but LV, at least, also contains some verses in Apabhraṃśa meters). Their alternations of long and short syllables are as rigidly applied as in Sanskrit, except that in many meters two shorts may be substituted for one long, and one long for two shorts. An initial consonant cluster never 'makes position;' that is, a short vowel at the end of a preceding word constitutes a short syllable. In the seam of compounds, this rule is optional; that is, juncture may be close or open between the parts of a compound, which may be treated as one word or two in this respect. The reason for this peculiarity obviously is that what is written as an initial consonant cluster was originally pronounced in BHS as a single consonant, in Middle Indic fashion.

Still more strange, from the Sanskrit standpoint, is the free and seemingly arbitrary lengthening or shortening of a syllable metri causa. This is accomplished most commonly by lengthening or shortening a vowel, but also by nasalization or denasalization, and by doubling a consonant after a short vowel, or conversely simplifying a double consonant (or orthographic cluster). All these alterations metri causa are commonest at the end of a word, or of a part of a compound; but they also occur internally. In general, the last syllable of a pāda counts as long (that is, an automatic pause is implied); but occasionally, in some meters, lengthening m.c. seems to occur there, and even at the end of a line.

The recognition of these principles brings with it the corollary that once the meter of a verse is recognized it is sometimes necessary to emend the mss. in accord therewith. This is justified by the fact that the mss. themselves so regularly present such 'arbitrary' lengthenings and shortenings, when meter requires them, that we must assume copyists' errors when they fail to do so. In the verses of most texts, such failures are relatively rare. In the Mahāvastu they are commoner; but many of the verses of that text show in other respects that the copyists did not understand the meters; the mss. are often full of gross and obvious corruptions. This will be clear from the Mv verses found in this Reader. It is, in fact, sometimes hard to determine the meters of Mv verses; and sometimes the editor failed to see that they were verses at all. To establish the text of them a good deal of bold emendation is at times required. I cannot claim certainty for all of my attempts.

Abbreviations and Conventions Used in Notes:

Figures preceded by §(§) refer to the numbered sections of my BHS Grammar.

Indic words enclosed in parentheses, without comment, give the Standard Sanskrit equivalent of a BHS form.

Indic words preceded by 'for' give the reading of the text as printed, which has been changed here. When the word 'for' is preceded by 'mss.', this means that all mss. are reported to have the reading adopted by me. When it is preceded by 'v.l.', one or more of them read so. When it is preceded by 'm.c.', I have emended in accord with metrical requirements. The term '(metr.)' is used to call attention to the fact that metrical requirements have determined my choice (which however has support in the mss.).

'D.' refers to my BHS Dictionary, under the entry cited after D. When not followed by any entry, the entry to be sought is the word in the text to which the note refers.

'pron.' = pronounced, when the orthography is misleading; §1.38.

Other abbreviations will, it is hoped, be self-explanatory; and it is believed that they are all explained in the Bibliography and Abbreviations in the Grammar.

The Deer-king and the Doe

Mahāvastu i.359.18–366.8. This celebrated tale, best known perhaps in its Pali version (Jātaka 12; i.149 ff.), is supposed, according to BHS tradition, to have had its scene laid in the 'deer-park' at Benares, to which it gave its name; see the end below. On the text of the Mahāvastu as a whole see the Bibliography to my Grammar, also §§1.34 (with n. 13), 36, 38, 44–48, 73. The punctuation of my text, in general, follows that of the mss., without report of Senart's alterations.

The Wolf and the Sheep

Mūlasarvāstivāda Vinaya iv.227.17–228.19. This is presented as an interesting variant on the well-known European fable of the Wolf and the Lamb. So far as I have been able to discover, neither this nor any other form of that fable has previously been recorded in India, with the single exception of a Gondi story (Tiger and Goat) recorded in the Linguistic Survey of India iv.526. I owe this reference to the kindness of Murray B. Emeneau, who observes, rightly as I think, that it is so extremely close to the European fable as to be suspicious; it may well have been a very recent 'plant', or introduction from a European source.

1. D. yāvat (3). 1a. repeated twice below; interpretable, no doubt; LV parallel (187.14) siktaḥ saṃmṛṣṭo (all mss.; Calc. saṃspṛṣṭo); one of the two is surely a graphic corruption (s:m) for the other; LV makes much easier sense, but might be a lect. fac., and if Calc. rests on a real ms. reading, it partially supports Mv; Tib., however, phyags nas, 'having swept'. Pali versions lack the expression. 2. here one ms. deśa-deśeṣu, but repeatedly below both mss. The First Sermon (Mahāvastu), Part 1

This, known as the Dharmacakrapravartanasūtra, is a combination of two originally quite distinct parts, in Mv and LV, and in the Pali Vin. i.8.31 ff. Mv still clearly shows the seam between them. Part 1, Mv iii.328.20–329.15, an introduction to the Sermon, occurs elsewhere in Pali by itself, in MN i.171 ff., immediately following Buddha's meeting with the ājīvika Upaka, which also immediately precedes in Vin., and not quite immediately, but after short and largely similar intervening sections, in Mv and LV. The beginning of Part 1 is fairly similar to the Pali in both Mv and LV, but expanded in Mv and still more in LV; yet fundamentally the opening sentences in the LV tradition resemble the Pali more than Mv does at this point. Part 1 is concluded in Mv with a passage of about a page (329.16–330.16) which I omit here. Then, in Mv, 330.17–333.17, Part 2, the Sermon proper, begins with evaṃ mayā śrutam, as if it were a quite independent text. And indeed it is that. It occurs alone in Pali SN v.420 ff., introduced by evaṃ me sutaṃ. The two parts are much more skillfully joined in Vin., which conceals the seam quite well. In LV there is a much longer expansion (omitted here) at the end of Part 1 (it only partly resembles the page of Mv which I have omitted), into which at last the beginning of Part 2 is skillfully and imperceptibly fitted. The bald and awkward way in which Mv joins the two originally disconnected parts suggests relative antiquity (as well as lack of art) in this aspect of the Mv tradition, contrasting with not only LV but even the Pali Vin.

The Conversion of Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana

Mahāvastu iii.56.6–67.7. Same story in Pali, AN. comm. i.155 ff., Dhp.comm. i.88 ff. Cf. Oldenberg, NGWGött. ph.-hist. Kl. 1912, 124 ff. The two stylistic types which O. distinguishes correspond, as he points out, on the whole to styles found in canonical and post-canonical Pali, respectively. But O.'s precise division between the two, in the text of Mv, seems to me more sharp than the facts warrant. Actually there is quite a bit of mixture in Mv. O.'s 'style B' (Pali canonical) really begins (as in Pali Vin.i.39.23 ff.; the preceding part is not in canonical Pali) not with Mv iii.60.1, as O. says, but with the appearance of Saṃjayin, iii.59.9. The introductory sentence in Mv is very close to Vin.: tena khalu puna samayena Rājagṛhe nagare Saṃjayī . . . parivrājako pañcaśataparivāro (see n. 32) parivrājakārāme prativasati = tena kho pana samayena Sañjayo paribbājako Rājagahe paṭivasati mahatiyā paribbājakaparisāya saddhiṃ aḍḍhateyyehi paribbājakasatehi. Then follows, in 59.10–19, a passage in 'style A' (Pali post-canonical), not found in Vin. Also 58.11, in the midst of an 'A' passage, clearly belongs to 'style B'. There is mixture of the two styles likewise after 63.2 (where O. makes the principal 'B' passage stop), and some parts can hardly be said to belong clearly to either 'A' or 'B'.

Death of the Buddha

Mahāparinirvāṇasūtra 41.1–18; Pali correspondent DN ii.154.1–156.34; the section on the four holy places occurs earlier in Pali, 140.17–141.11; Pali 154.17–22 contains instructions for dealing with the evil monk Channa, corresponding to an earlier passage of MPS, 29.13–15, on the monk Chanda. In the text here printed, I follow Waldschmidt (abbreviated W.) in enclosing in parentheses matter not found in his fragmentary mss. and supplied by him, on the basis of the Tibetan translation, largely supplemented by parallel BHS passages; that the suppletions are approximately correct seems certain. W. has Sanskritized the saṃdhi throughout; I have restored that of the mss. without note or comment. I have also followed the mss. in punctuation, or rather general lack of it; W. puts in many daṇḍas, with much justification, in view of the usual carelessness of most mss. in this regard. Grammatically, the text of MPS is more Sanskritized than many BHS texts, yet the mss. show not a few proofs (aside from saṃdhi and vocabulary) that it is BHS. Unfortunately W. has removed many of them in his edition; but in this particular selection the only case is āmantrayati, twice emended to °te (note 6).

The probable original significance of this action, and of the Buddha's last words (which are paralleled, but unmotivated, in Pali), was, in my opinion, successfully made clear by W. (see reference in his note); Buddha reveals his own body, with its signs of old age, to impress on the monks the transitoriness of all conditioned states. It is true that this is not clearly stated in any version; after the Buddha had become a supernatural being to his followers, the original motivation became repugnant, and was replaced by a reference to the rare chance of beholding a Buddha; this seems to me (with W.) clearly secondary. 11a. so clearly Tib.; and Chin. makes Ānanda the speaker of this sentence, which is not in

Edifying Stanzas from the Udānavarga

See §§1.42, 43. A = Chakravarti's oldest and best (fragmentary) ms.; B = any of his later (also fragmentary) mss.; Ch. = Chakravarti; P = Pali versions of the stanzas (references in Ch.). All mss. seem to be from Central Asia. Text follows A, except as noted, when it exists; lacunae in A are indicated by parentheses, which follow B unless the contrary is stated. Otherwise B's readings are cited only sporadically.

iv.1 (apramādo)'mṛtapadaṃ pramādo[1] mṛtyun(aḥ) padaṃ apramattā na mriyante ye pra(mattā yathā mṛtāḥ[2])

1. A °da. 2. ? so P (matā); B sadā for yathā; Dutreuil yadha.

iv.18 evaṃ dharmād apakramya adharmam anuvartiya[1] bālo mṛtyuvaśaṃ[2] prāpta[3] ak(ṣacchinno va dhyāyate[4])

1. A °yaḥ; B °vartya ca; P anuvattiya. 2. B, P -mukhaṃ for -vaśaṃ. 3. so A, B; P patto. 4. P (SN) akkhacchinno va jhāyati; B chinnākṣa iva śocate (P Miln. 67.2 also socati; but in iv.17 A dhyāyate, like P jhāyati, against B śocate).

vii.5 kāyena kuśalaṃ kuryād (vacasā kuśalaṃ) bahuṃ[1] manasā kuśalaṃ kuryād apramāṇaṃ niropadhiṃ[2]

1. A bahūṃ (§12.30, end); B bahu. 2. B niraup°; D.

vii.6 kāyena kuśalaṃ kṛtvā vācā hi atha (mānasā[1])

The Lost Heir

Saddharmapuṇḍarīka, Chapter IV: KN 100–120. In the notes to the two selections from SP, I cite all changes (except a few corrections of simple and obvious misprints) from KN = Kern-Nanjio's ed.; WT refers to Wogihara-Tsuchida's ed.; O = readings from fragments of the Kashgar recension, cited in KN's critical notes; K′ = a (Nepalese) ms. cited by WT (of which I was able to consult a photostat, but only after my work was completed, so that I have few independent citations; WT did not make full use of it; it is carelessly written, especially in that it frequently omits the stroke above the line for e or o, so that a often means e, and ā means o). In general, O readings are more non-Sanskritic, and therefore closer to the original, than the other (Nep.) mss.; but see §1.40. For this reason, other things being equal, I regularly adopt them. But it often happens that readings cited by KN from O are irreconcilable (because incompletely cited), in meter or sense, with the context; I have had to ignore these. It is obvious that KN undertook to Sanskritize the saṃdhi thruout. In other respects, too, their ed. and critical notes are extremely unreliable (§1.74). A careful collation of the mss. would certainly make possible a much better edition than what follows, which is, nevertheless, I think I can say, at least an improvement over existing editions.
